❖❖❖❖❖*Tip: Save your introduction as a separate document before you start writing it. Then you can insert it at the beginning of your document, complete it and proofread it several times before you start writing the rest of your article. ❖❖❖❖❖

In this article I'll show you how to create a unique introduction for each article, so that each of your articles will have its own special greeting and a special call to action at the end. This convention has two effects: It attracts readers' attention and encourages them to read on. It helps readers remember your name and some of the things that you have written in earlier articles. To achieve this goal, we will create a template for each article, which we will later use with different introductions. When do I need a unique introduction? If you're writing a short article, which doesn't have to be long, then any introduction isn't needed. In that case you can just use the same introduction for every article. But when you have a longer article, in which you want to add a bit of variety in each part of it, there's no harm in adding a different introduction with each new part of an article. What are the best ways to create a unique introduction for each article? 1. Use the same thing, but change the wording slightly. You can make some small adjustments in text or you can change some pictures or pictures with words on them. 2. Create a new document and write something completely different on it, but stay away from too many differences in wording and/or images on the new document. 3. Create a series of articles that are similar to each other, but have different introductions for each of them. You can do this by adding a loop into your main article using an outline template that you have already created earlier. How do I make my article unique with a different introduction? Place your cursor at the beginning of your article (the beginning of your document) and add a small tag to it. Something like [body_of_article] or [introduction]. Note: You can add [intro] or [intro_by_name], if you want to change one later and not the other. Then you will be able to create an additional introduction for this tag by using the Insert>Template>File option in Microsoft Word. Keep in mind that people usually read from top to bottom, so place your tag at the beginning of your article.
